Abstract

Since 2012 the University of Southampton has had the privilege of working with Tomsk Polytechnic University, especially in the form of training programmes which enable TPU academics to deliver course content through the medium of the English Language. This talk traces the development of our joint programme, highlighting the challenges and opportunities of such a collaboration, and points the way to further future co-operation.

Abstract

Creating a MOOC - is it worth it? The View from the University of Southampton.

The University of Southampton has worked hard to produce a range of MOOCs on different topics over the last two years. Each course is aimed at a different audience, uses different methods to engage learners and has recorded different impact. In this presentation, I will consider the advantages and disadvantages of engaging with MOOCs and I will focus on a MOOC which I have designed called 'Understanding Language: learning and teaching'. This course has run three times now and reached over 140,000 people across the world. It is run through the UK's FutureLearn platform. The four-week course is a collaboration between the University of Southampton and the British Council (BC), and it seeks to introduce some key concepts in language teaching and learning, as well as offering a 'taste' of topics covered by a joint online Masters course run by the university and the BC. The first run of the course attracted 58,000+ learners, with 28,000+ taking an active part, of whom 40% posted at least one comment. The second and third runs have posted similar figures. The MOOC generated 4500+ expressions of interest in the online MA course and the next intake for that course saw a rise in applications. In this presentation, I will talk about some considerations in MOOC design, the impact of the course and the implications for how we take forward knowledge learnt from running a MOOC. I will pose the question and offer my answer: creating a MOOC - is it worth it? I would like to know what you think.
